Dear Mr. Tom Wheeler and FCC Commissioners,

I am writing to you, as a United States Citizen, out of concern for the issue of protecting and promoting the open internet. I find that the current proposal, which allows Internet Service Providers to charge for preferential treatment, is not in-line with the idea of an open internet. I propose reclassification as the best method to restore net neutrality at it had been before the January 2014 court ruling.

It is stated on the FCC website that an open internet treats all traffic similarly, but allowing paid fastlanes doesn't fit that description. Companies which require faster speeds for data-extensive services can already use peering and content delivery servers without allowing ISPs to charge extra fees. The proposed rules would likely result in a two-tiered internet, with established and paying companies having fast speeds, and startups and other non-paying companies left with unupgraded networks.

Thank you for encouraging open comments on the matter, and for taking my suggestion into consideration. I look forward to your decision on the issue, and I hope that you will successfully reclassify broadband to ensure that net neutrality stays in place.

Sincerely,

Samuel P. Mullin

Petition to save the internet

The world wide web as we know it, as an open internet, is in danger. A recent court ruling has overturned the FCC rules that kept your Internet Service Providers from charging you or the services you use extra fees to access you quickly. The overturned rules also prohibited your ISP from discriminating against or completely blocking certain content from reaching you. This petition will be sent to Tom Wheeler, Chairman of the FCC, and the FCC Commissioners. It will urge them to reclassify broadband services so that they may reinstate the old rules, instead of making new rules which allow for discrimination of data.

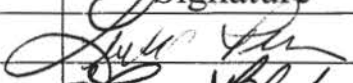

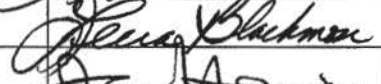

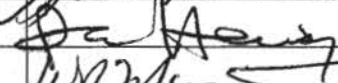

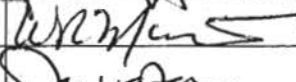

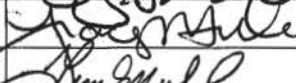

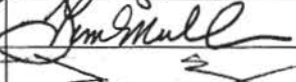

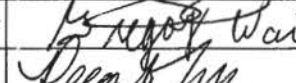

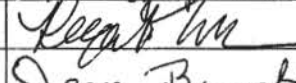

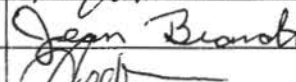

I, the undersigned, agree with this petition and affirm that I am a citizen of the state of Ohio.
